

Provider Contracting & Credentialing

When a provider chooses to become part of a network, a contract needs to be signed. When negotiating contracts that govern the provision and payment of healthcare services delivered by providers to members of the plan, the all-important rate of pay needs to be established, along with other essential components.

One of the first steps in the contracting process is credentialing. Credentialing is used to uniformly gather information to determine a providers ability to participate in a network. Specifically, it is the process of verifying the qualifications and backgrounds of professionals or organizations. Credentialing is an ongoing process and is the responsibility of the provider to update their information regularly.
